If confidence is half the battle, what is cverconfidence? In Cornell's case it was the loss of a game which by all natural bases of a game which by all natural bases of comparison should have been a decisive victory. From the time Michigan came to lifaca to be defeated, the university and the team had been so permeated with a belief in Cernell's invulnerability that interest in the Chicago game had become a question of total score. The coaches scented trouble and reminded the players that it might be as well to meet Chicago before chalking up the final figures. But to no svall. An overcordent team, encouraged to believe itself all-powerful by overconfident undergraduates, became demoralized when opposed by unexpected strength.
